Studying in Hamburg

Universität Hamburg is Germany's first democratically founded university. On 28 March 1919, the Hamburg State Parliament voted to establish the university. In 1911, the businessman Edmund Siemers donated what would become the University's main building. His motto „To research, to teach, to educate and form,“ may still be read above the main door and Universität Hamburg remains committed to these principles today. Accordingly, the University sees research and teaching as inseparable spheres of activity. It is their interaction which makes sustainable education possible.

The International Master Program „Languages and Cultures of Southeast Asia“

With the areas of concentration

- Indonesian / Malay Studies
- Thai Studies
- Vietnamese Studies

Duration: 4 semesters

Admission: Every term (summer and winter)

Degree: M.A. in “The Languages and Cultures of Southeast Asia”

Goals and Content

The International Master in Southeast Asian Studies offers three different tracks or studies: Indonesian/Malay Studies, Thai Studies and Vietnamese Studies. Every track consists of two compulsory modules, „Southeast Asian Languages and Literatures“ and „Southeast Asian History and Society.“ Students can choose from one of three areas of concentration, all of which are related to the research profiles of the Asien-Afrika-Institut and the Department of the Languages and Cultures of Southeast Asia. Our research spectrum includes such diverse fields as manuscript cultures, modern literature, history, religion and society. Graduate research should contribute to departmental research. The compulsory „Southeast Asian Studies: Theories and Methods“ module forges a link between instruction and research.

Program Objectives

The M.A. program targets German and international students, particularly graduates of B.A. programs in Southeast Asian Studies. Students from Southeast Asia are most welcome. Besides imparting intercultural skills, this program focuses on the languages, cultures, histories and societies of an important, culturally diverse Asian region undergoing rapid development. In accordance with Universität Hamburg’s traditionally high academic standards, students receive rigorous training in one of the program’s three areas of concentration:

- Indonesian and Malay Studies
- Thai Studies
- Vietnamese Studies

The M.A. prepares students for both academic and practical careers as well as for doctoral programs in Southeast Asian Studies.

MA Program

The M.A. program consists of two compulsory modules, “Southeast Asian Languages and Literatures” and “Southeast Asian History and Society.” Students can choose from one of three areas of concentration, all of which are related to the research profiles of the Asien-Afrika-Institut and the Department of the Languages and Cultures of Southeast Asia. Our research spectrum includes such diverse fields as manuscript cultures, modern literature, history, religion and society. Graduate research should contribute to departmental research. The compulsory “Southeast Asian Studies: Theories and Methods” module forges a link between instruction and research. The final module consists of a master’s thesis, an oral exam and a compulsory colloquium.
